F. DIVERSITY, EQUITY and INCLUSION

My approach with the Vegetable Breeding and Genetics program has been to embrace diversity, equity and inclusion. Over the past two and a half decades, many students from diverse backgrounds, genders and sexual orientation have come through the program and I have always tried to treat everyone fairly and with dignity. Eleven (38%) of the graduate students I have advised are minorities and half have been female. Of the 25 undergraduate students that have done senior or honor theses in my program, 56% have been female. From 1980 to present, I have been involved in research and education in East Africa and during that time have advised two graduate students and two post-doctoral trainees from the region. One of my recent graduate students is female, Hispanic and first generation to attend college in her family. I have also taken the OSU search advocate training (2017) and have served on one search committee in that capacity. Several of my research projects have involved farmer participatory research. In this capacity, I am particularly proud of having worked with farmers from underserved regions and communities. Examples would be our Northern Organic Vegetable Improvement Collaborative plant breeding workshops. These have been held in a number of regions around the U.S. but I would specifically mention ones we have done on the Flathead Indian Reservation in Montana, on O’ahu in Hawai’i and with Commonwealth Seeds and Southern Exposure in Virginia. From Hawai’i workshop we have developed a collaborative tomato breeding project.
